

Kolawole A. Bankole, MD, MS is a physician and senior medical officer from Nigeria, a U.S.-trained health policy and management expert and honor society member of Phi Kappa Phi, and a U.S.-medical board eligible. He presently manages the Minority Health Program and he is also the Access Project Director for the Public Health Division, Health and Human Services Department, City of Portland, Maine. He is currently an Adjunct Faculty Instructor of Health Policy and Management with the University of Southern Maine's Muskie School of Public Service. His special interest is access to health care for vulnerable populations working through direct communities, healthcare service providers, policy makers, and, the legislative involvements. Over the years, he has written & managed grants, and provided consultancy services to implement policies and programs that positively impact improved access to healthcare services for the racial/ethnic minority groups. He has presented on cultural competence at national, state, and local conferences, workshops, and forums, and serves as a board member of a number of organizations. He is a recipient of many awards, including the Maine Public Relations Council Silver Award, 2007 Maine Governor's Council on Physical Activity for Communities Award for Special Populations, and the City of Portland's Employee of the Month Award, September 2007.