Community pharmacists dispense and compound an ever increasing number of prescriptions for non-human patients but receive very little education on veterinary medicine. Many medications that are used commonly in humans can be dangerous or potentially fatal to companion animals. This lecture will describe the physiologic and metabolic differences between humans and companion animals and how these changes affect drug safety. I will also discuss careers available in veterinary pharmacy and residency options that are available.